The first New England state to ratify was Massachusetts and already it seems sure that special sessions will be called in Maine, New Hampshire and Rhode Island. Vermont will surely not want to be the last New England state to ratify. One of the states which called special session to ratify was Kansas where the legislators paid their own expenses and went without pay for a one lay session at Topeka to ratify. New York, although it will have a regular session next January, had a special sesion to show how favorably it feels toward woman suffrage after giving it trial within the state for a year and s half. Ohio and Pennsylvania, two states without equal suffrage, have ratified and the following day after ratifying, the Ohio legislature granted presidential suffrage. Two presidential suffrage states, Iowa and Missouri, will have special sessions on Wednesday in order that their women may celebrate with special joy Independence day. Enough more special sessions are already promised so that it seems likely if Vermont does her part by having a special session the ratification might be completed by the re
